Hi Karl,

Finally back at the office and heard from a couple of people who were working with this – first sorry to hear they may bring me your way. My colleague, like me, use "industry partners" in a broad way, one that doesn't denote any financial, strategic, or other way but working alongside each other in agriculture and science. I would assume they would back off because you guys have been clearly independent, running on self and creativity not money dollars and it would really get a response from the science community. It would be hard for the company to get a precedent of answering every nasty claim they make (there are so many) with a statement but we obviously want to help. If you feel any pressure building up or anything though, I will hop out on my own and take action without any review process, etc. I'd be happy to hear that you all have made it clear independence is critical and can totally understand if you feel the need to assert that independence clearly. You could even tell me (number redacted) so I get it done in a moment's notice.

Dear James,

Thank you for helping to answer my previous questions. I have another!

While I am sure that you are correct in your assessment, it is still a bit unclear to me how you arrived at this conclusion. I have been reading your "Industry Partner" but as you know I have worked very hard to maintain our independence. I remember when someone said that at the end of the day in 2014 when you mentioned that you felt some of your colleagues at Monanto to "step away" when they found out and through up their funding in

The document which is linked, suggests that we are not independent even though we are. We have to work on "knowing" with Monanto per the document which is the article. We were not the same then as we are today as we are today!

Would it be possible to get a PDF statement from Monanto that can publish that explains the error in documents to the rest of the world? As you can imagine, this would be a great tool to use in our reputation, and in our www.monanto.com website to provide transparency!
